EMPLOYEES TO BE ENTITLED TO HOLIDAY PAY DURING SICKNESS?

The latest opinion from the European Court of Justice (ECJ) on 20 January is likely to mean that workers are to be entitled to accrue holidays when they are off work due to sickness. If the House of Lords agrees and passes judgment – which it is likely to – the ruling to the contrary made only 4 years ago will be completely overturned.

Insisting that under the EU Working Time Directive, employees have a right to a minimum amount of paid annual leave, the court said “a worker does not lose his right to paid annual leave which he has been unable to exercise because of sickness. He must be compensated for his annual leave not taken.” This means that an employee who is on sick leave at the end of the working year must be able to carry over into the next year any holiday that he has been unable to take. It also means that employees who are sacked or leave work whilst they are off sick are entitled to pay equal to any holiday they could not take as leave during that time. The ECJ has left it to member states to decide if an employee can take holiday during a period of sick leave.

Clearly in the current uncertain economic climate this is disturbing news for businesses who may now incur substantial unexpected expenses and potential long periods of time with staff away from the work place. The CBI described the ruling as “a real blow to firms trying to keep jobs alive during the recession”.
